FOREWORD

It is believed that a list of the productions of N. Currier and Currier & Ives, will prove of great help to those interested in scenes and customs of the Nineteenth Century.

The present day values, incorporated in an alphabetical list, will form a book of reference and guidance for collectors of these lithographs. This book is offered, therefore, with this idea in view.

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTION

In a work so exhaustive of a subject as this book, covering a span of more than fifty years, it must be realized that it would be impossible for the author, or any living man, to have examined all of the lithographs listed. The capitalization has been done in exact duplication of the wording on the prints where it has been possible to examine them, or in duplication of the records.

The dates appearing in connection with the works of N. Currier are the days on which the print was made public. The records, specifying the exact date, were discontinued after June 8th, 1870, and thereafter it was possible only to give the year. In a number of cases two dates are given. One of these, of course, is a part of the title, and the last date given is the day of publication. As an example, "Great Conflagration at Pittsburg, Pa., April 10, 1845. May 9, 1845." The first date is the day of the fire; the second, the date of publication of the print.

All productions before May 6th, 1857, were under the name of N. Currier. All after that date were Currier & Ives.

In the beginning, N. Currier made little use of the Copyright Office. According to the records, the first entry was "Gulick Guard," dated March 19th, 1838. In 1840 the records show that four prints were copyrighted. In 1841, three appear; in 1842, seven, and in 1844, twenty. I have failed to find any for 1843. Search of the early records is very difficult, however, owing to the crude recording methods in vogue at that time. Undoubtedly some subjects were copyrighted in 1843, for N. Currier appears to have been doing business continuously, but in 1845 the records show forty-five. From that time on there was a big increase, and whole lots, sometimes a dozen, were dated in one day.

The last print copyrighted by N. Currier (1857) was "American Forest Scene: Maple Sugaring," and it commands an approximate price of $50. Currier & Ives copyrights appear regularly after May 6, 1857.

Many prints issued by N. Currier bear no date at all. This is also true in the later partnership of Currier & Ives. Sometimes it is possible to say within a range of two or three years, when these appeared. This is apparent oftentimes from style of dress, hats, or from signs on buildings and the like. In this work, however, no effort is made to give any dates except those which are either on the print or are available in record books.

A peculiar circumstance appears in that there does not seem to be one print regarding James G. Blaine. To one who remembers the hectic campaign for President in 1884, in which Grover Cleveland and James G. Blaine were the candidates, culminating in the election of Cleveland, this is amazing, to say the least.

But the firm of Currier & Ives seemed to have been producing numerous sketches. Political and historical subjects were being cared for by the newspapers.

Prints with such titles as "Agnes," "Lucy," etc., are in no demand, and usually fetch from $1 to $5. Certificates of birth, membership, marriage, etc., are of value only to those directly concerned. To be really valuable, a print must have some decisive appeal—it must have artistic value, it must be reminiscent of the home, or it must have historical value. The actual price is also dependent on size, condition and location, for a view of old Philadelphia, offered in Philadelphia, will invariably be more valuable than the same subject offered in Chicago.

The values quoted in this book are New York City values. They have been assembled through the help of private collectors, dealers in prints and by records of prices bid at auction sales in New York galleries.

CHAPTER II

CURRIER & IVES, RECORDERS OF HISTORY

AS an important recorder of American history, Nathaniel Currier will one day receive deserved recognition. Among collectors and those interested in the events, customs and personalities of the era between 1830 and up to about 1875 the quaint, naive and sometimes beautiful prints of Currier and later the firm of Currier & Ives are becoming known as important sources of historical information. No study of that period would be complete without the contribution of the many facts contained in these pictures, which form a comprehensive panorama of American life. Questionable as many of the prints are from the point of view of art, they almost all give an interesting reflection of the details of daily life or thought of the times, which will become more and more interesting and valuable as time goes on.

A little more than thirty years after Alois Senefelder, a Bavarian, had invented the process of lithography, Nathaniel Currier, then a boy of fourteen, was learning the craft as an apprentice in a shop in Boston. This establishment, which was the first, or almost the first real lithographic business in this country, was conducted by two adventurous young men, William S. Pendleton and his brother John. It had been only a few years before, about 1820, that the first attempt at lithography in this country had been made by Bass Otis, a pupil of Gilbert Stuart. This initial effort resulted in two small landscapes of indifferent beauty, but these were quickly followed by other and better work by American artists, among whom were Rembrant Peale and Thomas Sully. Soon also the commercial possibilities of the art were taken up, so that ten years after the first lithographic print was made in America the new method of popular reproduction of pictures was being actively carried on in Boston, Philadelphia, and New York.

It was to New York that Nathaniel Currier came after less than five years of learning the new craft of lithography. He must have been an ambitious and capable youth, for we hear of him engaging in business with a partner in the latter part of the year 1832, when he was only nineteen years of age. This venture did not seem to be successful, and so he and his partner, a man named Stodart, parted company after about a year of work together. In 1835 Nathaniel Currier was again established in business, this time by himself at 1 Wall Street. Here with two presses he started that flood of "colored engravings for the people," as he stated on his advertising card, that did not stop for sixty-five years. In 1850 he took as partner James Merritt Ives, who upon Currier's retirement in 1880 carried on the business with the aid of Curriers son. In 1901 the firm of Currier & Ives went out of business.

As is shown on many of the Currier prints and in the New York City directory, the place of business during almost seventy years of activity moved eight times, although always remaining in the same district of the city. The collector of Currier & Ives prints is greatly indebted to the research of Mr. Frank Weitenkampf, who has in his valuable book, "American Graphic Art," as well as in other publications, presented much interesting material about them. He has given the following addresses of Nathaniel Currier and Currier & Ives, which are helpful in approximating the date of a print where only the address is given. Nathaniel moved from his first place of business, 1 Wall Street and according to the New York directory was located at 148 Nassau in 1836-37; 1838-72 at 152 Nassau, corner of Spruce, which was also numbered 2 Spruce and where the partnership started in 1850; 1873-7 at 125 and 123 Nassau; 1878-84 at 115 Nassau; 1885-94 at 115 Nassau and 33 Spruce; 1895-96 at 108 Fulton; 1897-1901 at 33 Spruce. There is also record of Currier & Ives at 125 Nassau and 33 Spruce in 1873 and N. Currier is listed in 1866 at 125 Nassau and 33 Spruce.

Little is known of the personality of this early American lithographer, Nathaniel Currier. Apparently he was not only a good business man who made for himself a fortune, but he gave generously to worthy causes and was a genial friend to those who knew him. To his shop came men like Horace Greeley and Henry Ward Beecher to talk of the news of the day and see the latest proofs of his interesting prints.

The sudden and tremendous vogue of colored and uncolored lithographic pictures was doubtless due to the fact that in this new art a facsimile of the artist's drawing could be purchased for a low price. These prints which today we prize so highly were sold when they were published for a few cents a picture, or, as was the case with a series of scenes of streets issued by Jones & Newman, 128 Fulton, neighbors and contemporaries of Nathaniel Currier in 1848, a number of pictures in pamphlet form were sold for twenty-five cents. These particular ones were 8″ x 11″ in size and part of the cost was defrayed by advertisements of the merchants whose shops were shown in the prints.

Most of the Currier & Ives prints, however, were issued separately and sold on their merits. The cheap lithographs were in those days the only pictures on color of contemporary or historical events that could be secured by the populace. Copper and steel engravings were only for the few, and halftone reproductions in color were not available until the latter part of the period. There were no pictorial feature sections to the newspapers, and the illustrated magazines like Harper's Weekly and Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper were still to come, and when they did arrive, with their black and white woodcuts, they were not serious competitors of the colored lithograph. In humble homes the prints were often tacked up on the wall just as they were purchased, while among the better class the more pretentious prints were framed.

One must not forget that the Currier & Ives prints which today bring hundreds of dollars were one form of the much derided "chromo" which, a generation ago, was the target for ridicule by all those trying to make the world a safer place for "Art."

Of the oldest prints of Nathaniel Currier that are generally known, one is the "View of the Great Conflagration of Dec. 16th and 17th, 1835; From Coenties Slip." This was drawn on the stone by J. H. Bufford from his own sketch. It was "Published by J. Disturnell, 15 Broad Way & J. H. Bufford, 10 Beekman St." and marked "N. Currier's Lith. No. 1 Wall St." Another print of the same great fire is entitled "Ruins of Merchants Exchange, N. Y. After the Destructive Conflagration of Dec'br. 16 & 17, 1835." This was also sketched and drawn on the stone by J. M. Bufford and published by J. Dusturnell at 156 "Broad Way." It is marked "N. Currier Press." As the copyright notice carries the date of 1835, it is evident that the print appeared only a few days after the great fire. There is also record of a print entitled "Upper Canada College" marked N. Currier and also dated 1835.

The numbers sometimes found on early prints seem to be of little help. as they do not always appear in sequence. Possibly when the numbering reached, say, 1000, the next prints issued were started at number one. This would account for finding lower numbers several years after high numbers.

The subjects of the thousands of prints put out by

N. Currier and Currier & Ives during their many years of activity covered the whole range of American social life. Prints depicting historical events comprised not only the Mexican War and Civil War, during which pictures of battles were issued soon after they were fought, but also pictured scenes of the Revolution.

Especially numerous were pictures of General Washington, often on a white charger, and suggesting in the artist's heroic posing of the figure the intense admiration that existed for the Father of his Country. Then there were the popular Western scenes, which combined contemporary events of the warfare the Government waged for so many years with the scattered Indian tribes on the plains, with adventurous incidents of trappers and pioneers. These latter, though generally vastly outnumbered by the redskins, always held them at bay with their trusty long-barreled rifles.

Scenes of hunting in the East, especially in the Adirondacks, and along the upper part of the Hudson River, gave not only exciting incidents but interesting and often beautiful pictures of the wild scenery of those still unsettled parts. Ships, too, of all kinds were favorite themes for these old prints, and today the series of Clipper ships are among the most valuable and beautiful. These prints picture those trim, three-masted schooners, sleek as greyhounds and as fast, that were the source of national pride not only because of their superior fleetness compared with the vessels of all other nations, but because they did much in building up the ocean trade which contributed vastly to the prestige and prosperity of the young nation.

In addition to all these subjects were views of the cities, especially of New York. Pictures of important public buildings, such as the City Hall, the new Croton Aqueduct over the Harlem River, bridges, views of important streets, and great fires, came, one after the other, from the presses of these indefatigable workers. Also country views were produced which are among the most famous of their prints. Here a romantic touch was often given to the scene, and with an accurate knowledge of country life the artists showed rustic incidents, from maple sugaring in early spring to haying in the summer. In these series are found some of the most delightful of all of N. Currier and Currier & Ives' many subjects.

One must not overlook the less graceful but still interesting series of political cartoons on all the burning questions of the day. About the time the Mexican War ended in 1848 N. Currier began to actively supplement the intense political tempests of those times with many amusing and often cutting caricatures of the political situation of the moment.

Especially interesting are the caricatures issued from just before the Civil War by Currier & Ives up to the time when the advent of the newspaper and magazine cartoon began to dim the popularity of the single lithographic sheet. Allied with the cartoon were the comic pictures such as the series of caricatures of negro life drawn by the ready hand of Thomas Worth.

Although we are indebted to Nathaniel Currier and J. M. Ives for the printing and publishing of these prints, the vitally important part of making the original drawings was accomplished by the skill and artistry of numerous artists of the period. Some of the artists we know from the names signed on the print, but many of the lithographs carried no hint as to their creators. One of the most familiar names is that of F. F. Palmer. This was a Mrs. Palmer who for many years drew rural scenes "from nature and on stone" for the lithographers. Arthur Fitzwilliam Tait, under the modest signature of A. F. Tait, is another artist whose name is often found on some of the best Currier & Ives prints. He was an English painter who emigrated here in 1850 and settled in New York. His forte was landscape and animals, and his paintings soon earned him membership in the National Academy of Design. "The Prairie Hunter," "A Check. Keep Your Distance" and "American Forest Scene," the last named "maple-sugaring in the woods," were some of his paintings reproduced in these early lithographs.

Another artist whose work was used and who put on the stone not only his own compositions but also the work of others was Charles Parsons. He was a landscape painter, born in England in 1821, whose long career was spent in New York. A man of great versatility, his illustrations appeared in Harper's Magazine for many years, and he also directed the Art Department of the Harper Bros. publishing house. Scenes of New York such as "Central Park: Winter" allowed him opportunity to portray contemporary life with both interest and fidelity. In sea prints like "Hove to for a Pilot" and "Discharging the Pilot" he shows what he could do in drawing other men's work on the stone.

Other artists whose names are often found on these prints are Currier's partner, J. M. Ives, J. Cameron, G. H. Durrie and Louis Maurer. The last-named was not only one of the most famous cartoonists of his day and the author of many political prints issued by Currier & Ives, but he also lent his talent to producing series such as "The American Fireman" and to the picturing of country idyls. Reproduction of the work of famous painters of the day where the subjects had a popular appeal was also done. Among such artists represented by their painting drawn by others on the stone was George Inness, the great American landscape painter.

The most important period of these interesting prints was roughly the forty years from Nathaniel Currier's start in the early thirties up to the beginning of the seventies. As shown in their use of the work of such artists as George Inness. their prints on the whole were better than those of their contemporaries, being done with greater simplicity and having more human interest and illustrative effect. It was, after all, the authentic picturing of the life of the times that they strove to achieve in their lithographs.

When we have accepted certain conventions of coloring, such as uniform spring green for the trees and grass, blue for water and salmon or gray for stone work, we can discern a quaint delightfulness in the naivete and see how the very meticulous attention to details lends an authentic and pleasing air to most of the scenes. It is this fidelity to nature that gives these prints such a high historical value. Costumes, architecture, household utensils, farming details, street scenes. home interiors, and all the minutae of the American scene of the middle and last half of the nineteenth century is preserved with a completeness and range that is found in no other form. Collectors of Currier & Ives prints in preserving them are having the pleasure of their hobby and serving the historians of today and tomorrow far better than they generally realize.

CHAPTER III

CHRONOLOGY

The works of N. Currier and Currier & Ives are the reflection of the times. Pictures were too crude and expensive to be in much favor with publishers of newspapers and magazines. Therefore, it became the duty of our early lithographers to record the events of their day in pictures. These have survived in much greater numbers than the magazines and news periodicals of their day.

The office of an early lithographer must have been a very busy place indeed. Every event of great public interest, whether it was "The Burning of Chicago," or "The Terrific Combat Between the Monitor (2 guns) and Merrimac (11 guns), March 9th, 1862," was pictured, usually in colors, for the curious of the world, and the great American public in particular.

The whole establishment reflects the great influence news of the day had in this business, particularly the early political conflicts. Periodically there were the banners of the Whig, the Democratic and the Republican Parties. Following them were "The Presidents of the United States." Many of the works of N. Currier, of course, are among the most valuable products. These are, generally speaking, local historical prints. The "View of the Distributing Reservoir on Murray's Hill, City of New York" was published on

CONSTITUTION AND JAVA.

PLATE III

December 7th, 1842, and it has been sold at auction in New York for $125.00. On the same day, N. Currier published "The Battle of New Orleans, fought Jan. 8th, 1814. This print brought only $15.00 in an auction gallery, and emphasizes that age is not of such importance as association—for people still live who value a New York view, but have not such interest in the Battle of New Orleans.

From his beginning, N. Currier selected and admirably covered a very diversified range of subjects. In the Forties, when steam navigation on our waterways was still in its early stage, he produced the print entitled "An Awful Explosion of the 'Peace Maker' on board the U. S. steam frigate Princeton, Feb. 28th, 1844, by which Sec. of State Upshur, and Sec. of the Navy Gilmer were killed." Others were "Loss of the Steamboat Swallow while on her trip from Albany to New York," and "U. S. Steam Frigate Mississippi in the Gulf of Mexico, Mar. 1874."

At the same period in our early history among the national catastrophes of the day pictured were: "Great Conflagration at Pittsburg, Pa., April 10*th,* 1845, and "Views of the Great Conflagration at New York, July 19*th,* 1845." This latter spectacle was illustrated from the various vantage points—Bowling Green and Broad Street being two locations named.

Pictures have ever served to rouse interest and enthusiasm in time of war, and the lithographers of our early days as a nation did their part by displaying the gallantry of our commanders, our troops, and our navy, in hundreds of their finest masterpieces. Who can gaze on the picture of the engagement between the "Constitution and Java" or "General Taylor Never Surrenders" or "The Brilliant Charge of Captain May" without experiencing pride in our early struggles and confidence in our future? But with all this stress of time during political development, war, catastrophes, creation of great cities like Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston and New York, N. Currier still found time for a remarkable number of works on religious subjects and events of the home, of which "The Harvest Dance," "The Bride," "The Star of Love," "Husking," etc., are excellent examples.

Ten Years Later

In the Fifties America had developed toward the ocean. Her clipper ships sailed the seven seas. Her commerce and her importance was recognized throughout the world and she was intensely interested in her growing merchant marine. The result we find is that N. Currier was lithographing more and more ships. Vessels using steam had shown their worth in short voyages for years. Toward 1850, a great rivalry in trans-Atlantic mail service sprang up. Steamship companies became keenly competitive and the result, so far as prints were concerned, was that lithographs had to be produced of all the marvels of the age in the regular trans-Atlantic service. The "Atlantic," the "Pacific," the "Arctic," the "Baltic," "Asia," "San Francisco," "Washington," "Persia"—all were pictured at the height of their glory. But while steamships will ever excite wonder and amazement, it is the clipper ship that will arouse admiration, and in this N. Currier excelled. Such works as "The Clipper Ship Dreadnaught," "The Clipper Ship Red Jacket," "The Clipper Ship Ocean Express," "Discharging the Pilot," are among the more valuable of all the N. Currier lithographs offered today.

The country was opening up. Roads and canals were replacing the trails of the pioneers, and people in the country were assuming a higher standard of living, now that the settlers had been greatly relieved of their early vigilance against Indians and the necessity of eking out their existence from the soil and the forests. Therefore it followed as a natural development that N. Currier produced some of his most beautiful rural and hunting scenes during this period. "The American Country Life" series was copyrighted February 28th, 1855. While these subjects are not especially rare, they are among the most valuable of this type. In a number of cases, N. Currier developed small series with one general title, and this is one of those cases.

Another result of the relieved tension that our national growth had created, was the awakening of sports in the States. Horse racing had an importance as great as baseball or football has in our day. There were few families outside of the cities but boasted of a horse and, since everybody knew horses and prided themselves in their knowledge of horseflesh, it was only natural that trotting and racing prints should be in great demand. N. Currier met this demand with beautiful lithographs of the heroes of the turf. Pacing scenes, trotting races, such as "The Celebrated Pacing Mare Pocahontas," "The Celebrated Horse Lexington," "Some Pumpkins," "Trotting His Mile in 2.10," and others.

During this period new developments in our great cities aroused considerable interest. Spectacles like "The High Bridge at Harlem," "The Life of a Fireman" (series of four) and similar marvels of city life proved to be in great favor. Linked in importance to these achievements were the "First Appearance of Jenny Lind in America," "Castle Garden, Sept. 11, 1851," "Grand Reception of Kossuth at City Hall, New York, Dec. 6, 1851," "Barnum's Gallery of Wonders," "Mrs. Fisk and the Misses Fox," the original mediums who caused the mysterious noises at Rochester, N. Y., and dozens more.

In 1860, the Civil War Period, the nation was in turmoil. Civil war was impending, and the election campaigns were closely watched by both the North and the South. Pictures played an important role, and Currier & Ives produced a large share of them. John Bell, John Morissey, Hannibal Hamlin, John C. Breckinridge, Joseph Lane, Herschel V. Johnson, Stephen A. Douglas and many others beside Lincoln were shown. The campaign prints of Abraham Lincoln were particularly numerous.

In the next four years the attention of the nation was focused on the great conflict between the North and South. It was only logical that the demand for pictures would necessitate works recounting the battles of our ships, the storming of forts, the tragedies of war, slavery and the success of our arms. All of this had its climax in the assassination of Lincoln, in 1865.

Even during the war a large number of the most beautiful rural life scenes were issued, and many of these are considered without a peer. "Winter Morning, Feeding the Chickens," "American Hunting Scenes," "A Good Chance," "American Frontier Life," and "On the War Path" are only a few of the excellent prints produced at that time.

Transportation had proved its worth to the nation in war, and Currier and Ives could not resist the appeal and interest which the railroads were creating. About the same time a new monarch of the sea, "The Royal Mail Steamship Australasia, 3100 Tons" was produced. But the real interest lay in the railroad prints, such as "The Lightning Express Train," "Leaving the Junction," "American Express Train" and the "Lookout Mountain, Tenn., and Chattanooga Railroad." These railroad scenes are among the more rare of the surviving prints.

While the years 1864 and 1865 were devoted largely to political propaganda, the assassination of Lincoln and post-war excitement, still Currier & Ives seemed to sense the feeling of a restless people, and began to produce scenes of Western life.

The war had engenedered a restless nature in thousands of our soldiers. To return to their homes was not what they wanted—they yearned to travel—and the Great West held a lure from its gold-rush days. Currier & Ives apparently catered to the demand for western travel, so early in 1865 they put out many of their most beautiful western masterpieces. "Rocky Mountains," "Emigrants Crossing the Plains," "Yosemite Valley, California, the Bridal Veil Falls," "Across the Continent," "Westward the Course of Empire Takes Its Way," and others, equally alluring and fascinating were made.

By 1866 excitement from the war had abated. The stable government had gained the confidence of the people, and home life took its place in the minds of a peace-loving nation. Thus the period from 1865 to 1875 witnessed the greatest activity in the history of lithography. Every sort of subject on which the public displayed interest was made into picture form. Enterprising store-keepers subscribed to a service by which they received lithographs to display in their windows and on the walls of their shops, to the intense interest of the local population. Thus it was that many prints were supplied in two sizes, the large size intended to be sold and framed for decoration; the smaller, to be hung in a window to attract the passer-by, just as similar methods are employed in the present day by news photographers who supply current news pictures to small storekeepers to be posted in their windows.

Thus we find sporting events such as "James Ham- mill and Walter Brown in Their Great Five Mile Rowing Match," the "Yacht Squadron at Newport," "The Celebrated Horse 'Dexter,' the King of the World." In this period also appeared the first large production of humorous pictures. This phase of the business did not reach its height until a number of years later, but many remarkable examples appeared about this time, and their reception consequently must have had considerable influence in the development later of the fascinating humorous sketches which we of the present day so well remember on the walls of the barber shop back in the home town of our youth. Once plentiful, they seem now to have all been lost. Humorous Currier & Ives prints are seldom offered in the auction galleries of New York and sell at from $3 to $5 to $10.

The comforts of and love for home are typically portrayed in "Home to Thanksgiving," one of the highest priced Currier & Ives prints ever sold at auction in New York. This print brought $800.00. Others of a similar vein are "The Old Plantation Home," "Skating Scene, Moonlight," and "American Homestead," while the South came in for its share in "On the Mississippi, Loading Cotton," "A Race on the Mississippi," "Southern River Scenery," "On the Mississippi," "High Water" and "Low Water on the Mississippi."

At the recent sale of Currier & Ives prints at the Anderson Galleries, New York City, on Oct. 8, 1925, (Stephen Van Rensselaer Collection), "Life of a Hunter—Tight Fix" brought a high price, $625 being paid for this print.

Yachting seems to have been the vogue at this period, for Currier & Ives pictured not only the yacht clubs, yacht races and club regattas, but many of the popular racers of the day, such as the "Sappho" or the "Meteor."

By 1875, photography in one or another of its forms seems to have wrought a great difference in the lithographing business. It is hard to say what subjects predominate. The home and farm scenes, hunting, fishing, steamships and racing prints, all are becoming less numerous productions of Currier & Ives. In their stead are a mixture of works seemingly produced at random. "Trying It On," "Fleety Golddust," "Short Stop at a Way Station," "Try Our Clams," "Prime Tobacco," "We Met By Chance," "Hat That Makes the Man," and such a range of subjects seems to denote the passing of the importance and the prestige of the old lithographers.

The last stage of Currier & Ives is still too recent for much material to have developed. The trend seems to have grown more humorous and more commercial, barring the necessities of politicians who, since the beginning of the industry, used it in all the national campaigns.

Photoengraving had developed into a cheap and satisfactory method of reproduction, and the development of the modern printing presses enabled newspapers to distribute pictures so quickly that lithography slipped further and further down into obscurity. By 1880 we find the subjects being produced were tending more and more to sports, trotting horses and humorous subjects, until 1896, when the final print appeared.

WHITE-HOUSE
I'll do all I can to help you Breck. but my strength is failing and I'm afraid you'll pull me out, before I can pull you in.
Hurra my boughies! and get the door open, so that I can get in, for this nasty man is coming.
Confound it! none of these Jews will unlock this door, so I'd better be off for old Abe is after me with a sharp stick.
